MOTH FODDER

ALL KINDS OF TIME

"Hurry and get up, Barney," Benny Burro called to his pal, Barney Bear, one morning. "We overslept! It's late, and we won't get to work on time!"

"Yipe!" exclaimed Barney, jumping out of bed and looking at the clock. "We'll sure have to rush!"

A few moments later, Benny ran out to the car, calling, "Hurry, Barney!"

"I'm coming, I'm coming!" said Barney, from the kitchen, where he snatched a piece of toast to eat on the way.

With a roar, Barney drove the car out of the driveway and down the street, to join the speedy flow of cars on the main avenue which led to downtown.

"It's rush, rush, rush," he sighed. "Every day, all day!"

"Yes," replied Benny, "and right now, you'd better go a little faster, too. You're holding up traffic."

Barney Bear drove a bit faster.

"Oh, for the good old days," Barney pined, "when we had all kinds of time on our hands!"

"I don't think we really had all kinds of time," Benny mused. "It just seems that way, in looking back."

"Maybe you're right," Barney said, "but it would be nice to have time now."

The day was a busy one for Barney and Benny, as they went about their work, delivering orders for several stores.

"You'll have to hurry with this one," Mr. Spicer, the baker, said. "It's a cake for Mrs. Johnson, and she wants it for her luncheon. She's entertaining today."

"I'll hurry, I'll hurry," said Barney, jumping into his delivery truck.

Arriving at the Johnson house, Barney ran up the walk with the cake. Just as he reached the door he stumbled and — plop! — down went Barney, right on top of the cake! Squish! The cake was mashed!

"Oh, dear," wailed Mrs. Johnson, looking at Barney covered with the gooey frosting. "My cake is ruined!"

"I'm sorry," answered Barney. "I hurried too fast. I'll get you another cake."

"Oh, please do," said Mrs. Johnson. "And hurry back!" she called after him.

Barney rushed back to the bakery, picked up another cake and sped to Mrs. Johnson's house once again. This time, with a sigh of relief, he delivered the cake safely into Mrs. Johnson's hands. Next, Barney hurried to deliver groceries to another home, where hungry children were waiting. Then he rushed with laundry for a man who was without a clean shirt. Next, he hurried with paint for a painter, who could not finish his job without it.

At the end of the day, as Barney wearily started back to close up his delivery shop, a big square object in a store window caught his eye.

"Just what I need," he said happily.

That evening, Barney placed the object on the coffee table and leaned back lazily in his big easy chair.

"What in the world is that thing?" asked Benny. Then, "It's a four-faced clock!" he exclaimed. "There's a face on each side of the square!"

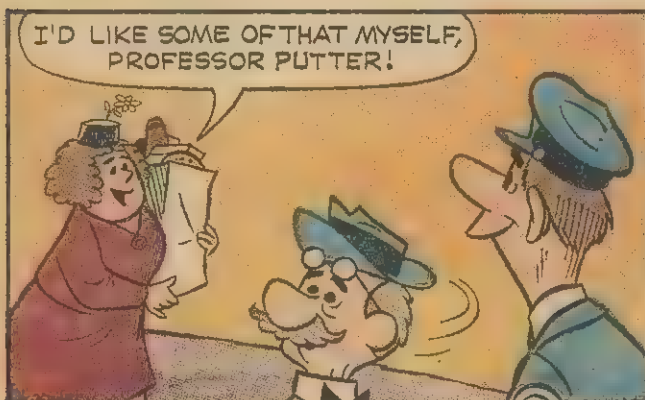

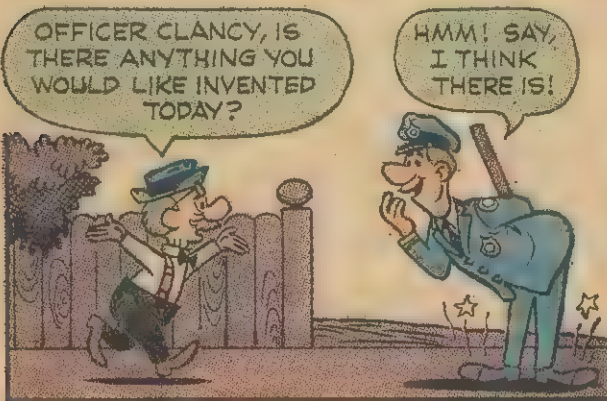

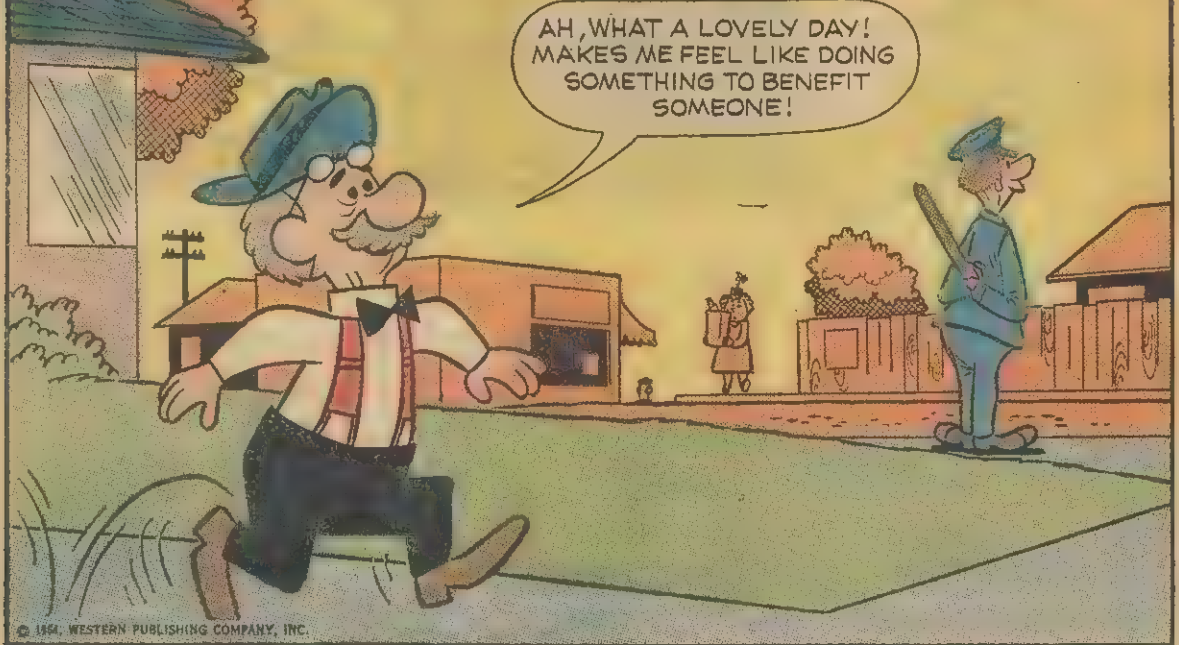

"Yup," answered Barney.

"And each face tells a different time!" exclaimed Benny. "What good is that?"

"Not much," replied Barney from the cozy depths of his chair, "but at least I feel like I have all kinds of time on my hands."
